Theatre South East Profile

LAWRENCE SEWELL

Lawrence Sewell trained as an actor for two years in London. His first job was in a summer stock company in the United States for a six week season during his first summer holiday from Drama School. On leaving the school he worked for a year as an actor touring plays to schools throughout Britain. He first came to Folkestone for the season in 1969, the last year of Arthur Brough's management. Following that he understudied in two plays in the West-End of London, "My Darling Daisy" starring Carole Browne, and "His, Hers and Theirs" starring Gladys Cooper and Hugh Williams and also did some television work. He first worked for Mr. Burnett at Bexhill in the summer of 1970 and has worked there several times since. His repertory experience, apart from Theatre South-East includes Richmond and Chesterfield. Last summer he toured for six months in Agatha Christie's new play "Fiddlers Five" and in the autumn, for a shorter time, in the same author's "Witness for the Prosecution". Immediately before the start of this present season he was playing in Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night" at the University Theatre, Manchester. Lawrence is married to Carole Hancock and they have settled down in Folkestone both finding it much to their liking.

Next week we are presenting BIRTHDAY HONOURS by Paul Jones. This is a scintillating and sophisticated light comedy, originally played with Hugh Williams and Moira Lister in the cast, which should keep you heartily amused from start to finish. We strongly recommend it as delightful light-hearted entertainment.
